northeast corner of Third avenue and Eighth street is a hotel, known as the Sanford House. Directly opposite on the southeast corner of those thoroughfares, is the Cooper Union Hotel The entrance to the Sanford House is on the avenue, through broad double doors leading into a spacious, marble-floored lobby, furnished with chairs, sofas, reading tables and a well-appointed clerk's office containing the usual hotel regis

The Cooper Union Hotel may at one time have had a Third avenue front entrance, but the door has long been securely boarded. The only means of entering the establishment at present is rough a narrow door on Eighth street just below the liquor saloon on the cormer. If you open this door you find your self confronted by a flight of stairs leading to the dimly lighted regions shove. In a round space between the bottom stair and the side wall is a little desk, on which are a small bottle of ink, one pen and a dilapidate i book. There is no place where a guest could sit down to enjoy a smoke or a newspaper after registering; in fact, there is not room for a chair.

At 11.30 o'clock Tuesday evening last six men were seated on the sofus in the lobby of the Sanford House. Two had registered as Henry Bryant and John D.
